MARINE CORPS AIR STATION YUMA, AZ, - Students and instructors from Weapons and Tactics Instructor Course 2-18 participated in offensive air support operations aboard Marine Corps Air Station Yuma, Ariz. April 10.

The primary focus of OAS is to support units on the ground with a variety of aerial platforms, aiding in the overall mission of the Marine Air Ground Task Force.

"Today we conducted OAS and as a KC-130J unit, our primary focus was aerial refueling," said Maj. Jason Ellis, a Weapons and Tactics Instructor and KC-130J pilot. "OAS is the bread and butter of what our platform is responsible for during WTI operations."

Although the OAS execution primarily takes place in the air, there are multiple military occupational specialties that participate from the ground as well. It is essential that all sections of the Air Combat Element understand the importance and basics of each job that takes place during

"Seeing the refuel from a pilot's perspective is vital for us as space planners," said Capt. Murray Best, A WTI student and Air Traffic Control officer. "This is especially helpful as WTI students so we can take the information we learn in an educational environment back to the fleet."

The OAS execution involves frequent communication with both the air and theground; this presents many stress factors that ground based members of the ACE might not be familiar with.

"I think experiencing OAS from the air helped us as ATC officers understand how busy they really are during a flight," said Capt. Travis Powell, a WTI student and ATC officer. "They have so many different forms of communication going on at the same time and it helped us learn how to relieve some of the communication stress on our end, ultimately helping the pilots conducting the mission."

This training specifically increases our tactical advantage by creating a level playing field where all MOS's understand what each job entails.

"It was fantastic to see how air to air refueling brings a huge advantage to the ACE," said Powell. "It allows us to provide OAS on other platforms for a longer time, ultimately helping the troops on the ground." One of WTI's main priorities is to equip officers within the ACE with the ability to seamlessly conduct aerial missions in a variety of training environments. Within that mission set, WTI students are forced to work with many different Marines from across the MOS spectrum, allowing networking and comradery within the MAGTF as a whole.

"This training is an important piece in what the students are learning at WTI," said Ellis. "The fundamentals of OAS are important across the ACE and it is essential that we train with a variety of MOS's throughout WTI 2-18."

In order to prepare for a fight, the Marines had to work on eating right and strengthening their bodies and minds.

"We are up at 5:30 a.m. just to start our first workout of the day," said Jones, an administrative specialist aboard the air station. "We always train together and push each other to our limits. We like to work out three times a day to maximize our potential to grow and work on our techniques. However, working out is only part of the training. We have to watch what we eat and make sure we maintain our weight class. "You can play basketball, football, and soccer but you cannot play boxing," said Collins. "When you train for boxing, it's a whole different mentality and workout. You have to utilize your entire body instead of just specific muscle groups. When you are in that ring it's just you and everything you have worked for. Only you bring son for a loss. ments adversary air as required for carrier groups or unit-level training for the Navy and Marine Corps," said David Robertson, the ATAC lead pilot. "We simulate enemy combatants during the training. We simulate different threats based on a multitude of scenarios which helps these guys get used to their aircraft."

The training syllabus for VMFAT-501 consists of classroom work and practical application with the F-35B Lightning II. By incorporating air combat training against dissimilar aircraft, the pilots of VMFAT-501 have to operate against a simulated enemy combatant.

"As a transition pilot, it can be very difficult when you adjust to a new aircraft," said Maj. William Paxton, a pilot trainport and valuable training which helps can learn from." our pilots get to where they need to be."

ATAC is flying with teams of MK-58 Hawker Hunter aircraft and the F-21 Kfir aircraft. They also supply the pilots and a team of maintainers to support the rigorous schedule. All of the cadre and maintainers are experienced prior service members. VMFAT-501 plans and organizes all of the training and logistics to acquire the proficiency they need. They will dictate all of the training scenarios and ATAC will provide the adversary presentation or "red air."

"We are here to support the squadron's needs first and foremost," said Robertson. "Whatever the squadron needs, we are more than happy to provide in any shape or form. We like to have the pilots fly against different types of aircraft so they ing officer with VMFAT-501.
